

Travis Wetland Trust Incorporated

Since 1983 a group of dedicated people has worked to save Travis swamp from encroaching urban development and to set it aside as a nature park.

In 1992 they banded together under the leadership of the late Mrs Anne Flanagan to establish the Travis Wetland Trust.

Their goal was to preserve and develop the swamp as a Nature Heritage Park for the education and enjoyment of all. The Christchurch City Council responded positively to the challenge by purchasing the remaining wetland in 1997.

As well as organising workdays and community planting days the Trust sources funding for boardwalks, facilities and specific projects. They also write submissions on policies, plans and strategies (such as the pest management strategy) pertaining to wetlands.

Trust Aims

- To continue to develop Travis Wetland as an educational, scientific and recreational reserve.
- To provide access for the public, while protecting the indigenous flora and fauna.
- To preserve species that are already in the swamp, especially those that are rare elsewhere in Christchurch.
- To continue restoration and enhancement of the varieties of native flora and fauna representative of the Canterbury Plains.

How you can help

If you are interested in learning more about Travis Wetland and would like to help in its development, maintenance and research there are many ways you can do so.

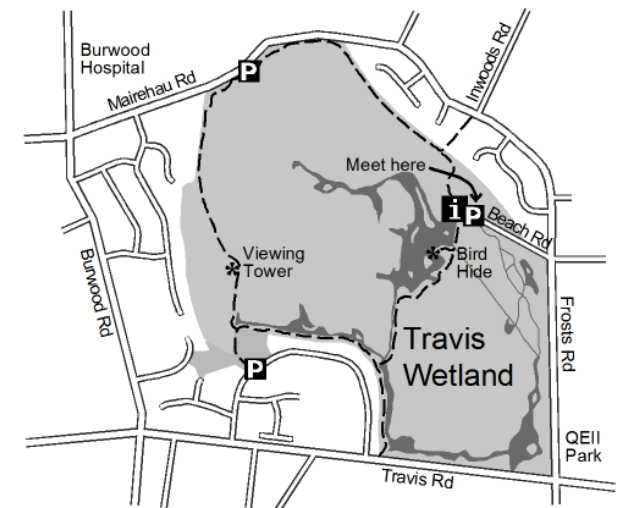

At present, help is best given through our monthly workdays, but some trust members are also initiating historical and ecological research and would welcome assistance.

Workdays

The Trust holds work mornings at the wetland on the third Saturday of every month. They begin at 9am and finish around noon, with a drink and something to eat following.

If you are interested meet by 9am at the Education Centre beyond the car park at the western end of Beach Road (off Frosts Road - see map). Tools and gloves are provided. Gumboots too, if you do not have your own.

For up to date information and reminders of workdays subscribe to the monthly email newsletter on the Trust website.
